

I am writing to insist the current regulations regarding net neutrality are upheld. The proposed changes have already been praised by major internet service providers, because such changes will be a corporate gain and a consumer loss. The internet impacts everyone and it's important to preserve equal access to content, a common benefit of the online experience that is threatened by the FCC Chairman and his agenda.

Allowing major ISPs to put their thumb on the scale would dramatically alter the internet for everyone in the United States. Unlike many of the changes that have come with the online age, the proposed repeal of the regulations would be a step backward. It threatens the potential for innovation and destroys the level playing field that has always been present. It offers to hinder and complicate progress. The internet is a utility paid for by consumers. ISPs should not be able to decide whatever content is easier or harder for their costumers to access. Please uphold the current net neutrality laws.

Sincerely,

Kyler Barton
